MEET THE 21ST PRESIDENT OF WESTFIELD STATE UNIVERSITY, Dr. Linda Thompson

Upon coming to campus, Dr. Linda Thompson, Westfield’s new president, looks at the big picture for a university that touches more lives.

“I began to think about how we connect with the state and community colleges in this region, to become a pipeline for those students to come here for degree completion, as well as master’s degrees,” says the veteran nurse, educator, administrator and advocate.

“One of the things in the back of my mind [coming here] is creating opportunities for people,” Thompson says. “As the president, I can do that.”

Thompson hopes to craft the kind of initiatives she did at UMass Boston’s College of Nursing and Health Sciences and West Chester University of Pennsylvania: expanding programs and partnerships with other institutions, developing resources for scholarships, recruiting faculty and visiting scholars, and increasing campus diversity.

“I’m paying a lot of attention to how we can become one of the best regional universities, what I would call a premier university,” she says.

Dear Friends,

Who could have anticipated that, despite navigating a pandemic, we would realize our most successful fundraising year to date? We have achieved this milestone due to your unwavering support. It warms our hearts to know that, literally, your generosity will help us transform the lives of thousands of students.

This past year, we were able to assist students struggling with food, housing and transportation insecurities, brought on by the pandemic, by raising over $50,000 for our Owls Helping Owls initiative to fund their immediate and critical needs. Our Criminal Justice alumni dug deep to establish a dedicated criminal justice scholarship, while Hockey alumni have helped make possible a dedicated locker room for our team. Your generosity in remembrance of Jerry Gravel, a professor, mentor, friend and coach who, for three decades, impacted the lives of students at Westfield State University will ensure that his passion for helping students is continued. An unprecedented planned gift has elevated our scholarship support to provide the first-ever dynamic four-year, $10,000 a year scholarships to be awarded to high achieving students. Indeed, this gift, the Paul W. Dower Live Strong Scholarship, cements Westfield as a premier state institution in the Commonwealth.

This was also a time of transitions as we said good-bye and thank you to interim president Dr. Roy Saigo and his wife, Dr. Barbara Saigo and welcomed our 21st President, Dr. Linda Thompson who, in the short time she has been here, has set an ambitious agenda for the institution.

There are so many good things happening through the Westfield State Foundation. We hope you enjoy reading and learning more about the few that are being highlighted this year. It is always difficult to determine which stories to share with you as we find ourselves surrounded by generosity, good will and caring in our Westfield State community and beyond.

With heartfelt appreciation,

Betsy Scheibel H’17

An avid outdoorsman, Paul Dower continued his adventures well into his later years. A favorite trip was canoeing James Bay, in the southern end of Canada's Hudson.

“It’s about the last wilderness there is, where you can do just about whatever you want,” Dower told the Springfield Republican in 2010 when he was 90 years old.

In a year marked by monumental challenges and changes, 2021 saw the implementation of one of Dower’s last wishes, to help Westfield State students finish their undergraduate days and embark on their life’s adventure.

With lifetime wealth acquired from a lifetime of investing, he spent his later days anonymously supporting the Last Mile Fund, which helps Westfield State students who just need a little extra financial assistance to get over the finish line of graduation.

A one-time student but not a graduate of Westfield State, Dower preferred anonymity during his lifetime, eschewing the notoriety his beloved sister Catherine Dower, who taught here from 1956 to 1990, received after she donated $1 million to the University during her lifetime.

“He had a good heart,” says Maria Perez ’18, who only last year learned the name of the person who helped make completing her education possible.

When he died just days following his 100th birthday, Dower bequeathed close to $4 million to Westfield State: a million to the Last Mile Fund, another million to establish the Paul W. Dower Live Strong Scholarship Fund, and the balance for a trust fund to be dispersed over the next five years.

The Paul W. Dower Live Strong Scholarship Fund is the University’s first full scholarship of $40,000, granting $10,000 per year for four years, awarded to high-achieving Westfield State students.
ALUMS Giving Back

For an increasing number of Westfield State alumni, the university isn’t simply just a part of their life history; it’s a returning point in a cycle of helping others.

“My whole life has been about giving back. That’s the way I was brought up,” says Thomas H. Convery ’78, a member of Westfield State’s alumni relations team since 2015, who funds a scholarship for students committed to community service. A longtime volunteer for the Make-A-Wish Foundation and organizations including the Jimmy Fund and Local Heroes, Tom says, “The one thing I try to tell people is, every little bit helps.”

Doing small things to make an impact is just the sort of thing that Nicole Erickson ’23, the 2021 education major and recipient of the Convery Scholarship for Community Service, is raring to do.

“In ten years, I see myself running a classroom that will give students the freedom to explore, and I want to be able to aid other teachers to do the same,” she says.

Receiving the Convery scholarship, the Mary & Herman MacDougall Scholarship, and gifts from the Westfield State Foundation and Class of 2008 “has alleviated a lot of stress for my family,” Nicole says.

With Veta Daley ’87 ’91, paying it forward means passing the opportunity all the way down to the primary school level. A retired Springfield educator, she established a scholarship fund that supports students of color planning to teach in Springfield and guarantees them jobs through the Reach to Teach program.

“The next generation of teachers needs to impact students in urban areas,” explains Daley. “Think about how powerful it would be if all of us decided to give back to our communities.”

“Everything I’m doing right now is for my students,” says Erick Zorrilla ’22, the 2021 recipient of the Veta Daley Scholarship.

A transfer student to Westfield State, Zorrilla says the university is a good fit with his belief in racial equity and representation. Seeing teachers like him at the head of the class significantly benefits BIPOC (Black, Indigenous, and People of Color) students; this fuels his ambition to teach.

“This scholarship is going to have a lasting effect on my life. It’s allowing me to get the right tools, the skills that I can give back to my students, to make them lifelong learners,” he says.

Another case study in cycling back to help Westfield State grow is the late Edwin Abar, who graduated from Westfield State in 1968 with a degree in English and later returned to found the Mass Communication Program, teaching here for 35 years. Upon retiring from the university, Abar established the Edwin J. Abar/Kiwanis Communication Scholarship.

“He had a vision, and he dedicated his life and energy to making that dream a realization,” says his widow Sylvia Abar. “When he retired, his desire was to have a scholarship, and he would love where it’s been used.”

The scholarship has “relieved a lot of the pressure of graduating and getting a job right away to pay off my student loan debt,” says Tom Mespelli ’22, who has set his focus on public service, with plans to teach English in Ecuador for the Peace Corps.

“I want to effectively share my inspiration, to make the world a better place,” he says.
As the child of an immigrant working-class family, there wasn’t a lot of extra money for philanthropy,” says Ana Hebra Flaster, who is currently writing a book about her family’s escape from Cuba in the 1960s.

The intervening years have provided many blessings, so after their daughter graduated from Westfield State in 2015, Ana and her husband Andy Flaster decided to support the university with a donor-advised fund.

“What particularly impressed us about Westfield, was, in addition to everything else, how so many of the kids that Natalia got to know were the first students in their family to go to college,” says Andy, co-founder, managing partner and chief operating officer for Volition Capital in Boston.

A Conversation with Ana and Andy Flaster

Why did your family pick Westfield State University?

Andy: So, our daughter Natalia knew she wanted to go into education, and Westfield has a great reputation as a school that delivers high-quality education graduates. She felt truly at home when she visited the campus. When she was accepted —and she was accepted at all 13 schools she applied to (can you tell she was our first child?)— she chose Westfield because of the quality of the program, the level of support that Westfield could deliver to its students, and she felt this student body was very down to earth. Ultimately, we left it up to her to decide, but we can’t say enough good things about her experience there. She did very well. She really felt like she belonged, and the school delivered on everything that she had hoped for. So we were thrilled.

Ana: On one of our first visits there, being typical parents standing in the main area of the campus looking around, not knowing where to go, I think we had four students stop to ask us how they could help us. That made such an impression on me. Just so friendly and kind. I thought, this is a place where Natalia will find not only great preparation for her field but also great friends, and she has indeed stayed very close to her college friends.

What’s your philanthropic origin story?

Ana: In college, I had loans and scholarships. When I graduated and right away started getting requests for donations, I admit I was shocked. It was foreign to me, these people asking me for money. But as time went on, and I got my feet under me, and Andy and I started having the privilege of being able to participate in philanthropy, I understood. I considered the scholarship funders and I thought: I don’t even know anything about them, but they were essential to me, and now I can be helpful like that, too.

What made you decide to direct your giving to your daughter’s alma mater, Westfield State University?

Andy: The places that need it are places like Westfield. The Ivy Leagues could, if they wanted to, literally subsidize the tuition for every student. But schools like Westfield State don’t have that kind of endowment, and they’re serving people, many of whom are first-generation college students. And they’re focused on teachers and [fields such as] criminal justice, people who are going to serve the public. Knowing how hard Ana’s parents as immigrants worked, and how important education was to her family, we just want to support that.

How might you make the pitch for other parents to give to Westfield State?

Andy: If you appreciate what the school has done for your children, and how it’s positioned them in their careers, then it’s a nice thing to help, to do that for others.

Ana: You never know just what your contribution will mean to someone. People finding their full potential, finding a career, those things don’t just happen. It takes people contributing in many ways to reach that goal of a student having access to good-quality education. Your contribution is going to mean a difference in not just their lives, but the lives of everybody they contact through their careers. What better thing to do with a little extra cash, if you should be lucky enough to have the funds? And if everybody does something, that’s more opportunities for people to make the world better. I don’t mean to be corny, but these things don’t just happen. Institutions don’t just happen.

Is there anything you’d like to add?

Ana: Only that, whatever Westfield is doing to create an environment of kindness and support and learning, keep doing it!

PERSEVERANCE PAYS OFF with Criminal Justice Alumni Scholarship

More than three quarters of Westfield State students require financial aid. Despite many scholarships offered at Westfield State, a growing number of students still need assistance. A new scholarship endowed this year will help address that need. The Criminal Justice Alumni Scholarship will be awarded to at least two criminal justice students each year, helping them fulfill their community-minded goals of public service.

In 2016, the Criminal Justice Alumni Association kicked off a fundraising campaign to establish the Criminal Justice Alumni Scholarship, initially raising $8,000. Criminal Justice Alumni Hall of Fame members also worked tirelessly to help create the scholarship. For the past four years, alumni and friends have facilitated the well-attended Hogan Golf Classic in Florida. Named after CJ Hall of Famer Bill Hogan ’77, the tournament aims to bring resources to Westfield students while providing an Owl networking opportunity.

The Hogan Classics have been successful, but the Covid-19 pandemic resulted in a brief hiatus. Instead of a tournament, the Hogan Classic Golf Committee decided to redirect their efforts and contributions to help endow the Criminal Justice Alumni Scholarship.

The hard work and collaboration of numerous alumni, including Marian McGovern ’89, Kevin Queenin ’70, Betsy Scheibel H’17, and Steve Marcus ’88, has brought this scholarship fund to $35,000, and now endowed, can be awarded in perpetuity.

For the 2021-2022 hockey season, The Westfield Owls will finally have their own dedicated hockey locker room at their home rink, Amelia Park Arena. The new locker room will feature professional-style locker stalls for each player, video equipment for team instruction, and additional team storage.

Because of the generosity of alumni and donors, nearly $60,000 has already been committed to the hockey locker room project. Curt Everett ‘79 shares his reason for giving, “I am proud to be a Westfield State Owl alumni hockey player and parent of two graduates from Westfield State. Helping future Owls was an easy decision,” said Everett.

This project would not be possible without gracious donors, like Everett and other alumni, including Ralph Studley ‘00. Studley reflected, “It is hard to summarize how I feel about Westfield Hockey. If I had to put it into one word, it would be pride. Hockey was a massive part of my life as a kid growing up in Scituate, and it was something that I thought was over for me when I transferred high schools.”

Fortunately, hockey was not over for Studley. He found his community with Westfield State’s hockey club team.

In the early and mid-2000s, Westfield hockey alumni united to form the Blueliners Club, which supported the fundraising effort that restored hockey to varsity status in 2008 after an 18-year hiatus. Peter Laviolette ’86, Washington Capitals head coach and Owls Hall of Famer, helped spearhead the first Blueliners campaign and helped launch fundraising efforts for the hockey locker room project.

“When we took on the task of restarting the program, it seemed as like we had a mountain to climb. So many have committed so much to make hockey at Westfield a reality. Having been able to play a small part in that gives me tremendous pride,” said Studley.

The new customized locker room will provide Westfield State players with an indispensable sense of pride in their community, all thanks to the support of numerous essential donors.

OWLS Helping Owls

Owls Helping Owls was established in March 2020 in response to the Covid-19 pandemic. The onset of the pandemic led to the loss of student jobs, housing, technology, food access, and more. To address these needs, the campus community reached out to alumni, faculty, staff, and community members. The response was remarkable. To date, over $75,000 has been raised, supporting the essential needs of nearly 90 students thus far. Owls Helping Owls is administered by a team led by Jennifer Propp, Ph.D., associate professor of social work, and Marjorie Rodríguez ’15, G’16, TRiO student support services program coordinator.

“Students were unable to pay bills, were going hungry, were living in unsafe conditions due to lost housing, and feared they would have to drop out of school because they could no longer afford their education. Owls Helping Owls literally changed the life trajectory for many students, allowing them to continue their education,” said Dr. Propp.

An anonymous student reflects on their experience:
“Owls Helping Owls had a huge impact on me. I found myself depressed and stressed about how I could afford necessities and school supplies. If it weren’t for these funds, I would not have been able to eat or do my schoolwork. There was a point in time where the floor in my bedroom caved and I lost a ton of my stuff, and my school stuff was destroyed. Owls Helping Owls helped me replace the things I needed to be successful. My GPA has since gone up. I couldn’t be more grateful to have had access to this resource, and I hope someday I can donate to help another student the same way it helped me.”

Community of Caring

Before Owls Helping Owls was established, an interdisciplinary network of resources was available on campus. Faculty and staff from nearly a dozen departments played a role, and still play a role, in supporting students with the greatest needs. FACES, the Albert and Amelia Ferst Interfaith Center, and the Common Goods Food Pantry are just a few of these organizations.

FACES (Fostering a Culture of Empowerment and Success), founded by Rodriguez, Propp and others, is a group that supports former foster and homeless youth by assisting with housing, food insecurity, and essential social-emotional and academic support.

“In response to the food insecurity crisis that students were experiencing on campus, the Interfaith Center in collaboration with an interfaith group of students and chaplains, along with faculty and staff, established the Common Goods Food Pantry located at the Second Congregational Church in 2016. This interfaith initiative has been and continues to be a valuable resource for anyone in need of food and other essential items,” said Father Savage, Director and Catholic Chaplain at the Interfaith Center.

“Unfortunately, the long-term impact of the pandemic on our students remains, and we continue to rely on these funds to help those who are still experiencing insecurities. We are so appreciative for the ongoing donations to this fund so we can continue to make a difference,” said Dr. Propp.
